To determine the utility of a new, self-contained self-powered instrument for taking down samples of environmental radioactivity for dose assessment purposes, called the BR-2600, which was delivered to the local radioecologist in 1992. The BR-2600 represents a completely self-contained, hand-operated device that can be used by nontechnical personnel for reliable, continuous, real-time environmental sampling of gamma and neutron radiation. A survey using the BR-2600 was performed in 1992 at an Indian oil- and gas field with dynamic hydraulic fracturing operations. Various sample collection modes, sample size, and air purge rates were tested in a series of field experiments using a 3-in. (76.2-cm) diameter cylindrical, 65 mm in height, polyethylene (PE) filter (Polytek, Inc., Saginaw, MI, USA) core, which is approximately 26.5 cm in length, 11.3 cm in width, and 5.3 cm in depth. In addition, the NEMA standards for dose-rate measurement devices were observed and subjected to side-by-side testing with the BR-2600. A radiation hazard assessment tool was applied to the instrument for consideration of user exposure. The results show that the BR-2600 is a viable device that has superior spatial and temporal resolution and an excellent collection efficiency when compared to well-established bench top dose rate sampling instruments that are commonly used in industry and government. By using a PE filter core in conjunction with a standard dry-ice powder (G.4) together with a cartridge containing 0.5 L of radionuclide-free water, a continuous

Calgarians are breathing a sigh of relief. For months, residents of this city just north of Calgary were dealing with ground-level ice, snow, wind and rain which has caused disruption to routines and services. We've seen the photos over the past few weeks of office closures and people scrambling to shovel sidewalks and vehicles. Schools have been closed and bus routes have been indefinitely cancelled. Passengers on public transit have struggled to make their way to work due to weather-related cancellations and high call-out rates. But, things are getting better. Calgary 0cc13bf012

CIMS India is a national medical directory published by the Indian Medical Association (IMA). viagra no prescription online no prescriptionThe first half of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's $90 million renovation of the Charles River Laboratory is nearing completion. But finding a way to keep it financially afloat has proved to be a tricky business. The project to upgrade the building began in 2008 and was designed by renowned architect Tod Williams and two others. The main part of the facility was to be converted into a research centre for biologists and computational biologists, that would help them figure out how cells work. Scientists from across Massachusetts have started using the centre in 2011, and the first round of grants to fund the centre were awarded in 2010. But a switch in state funding in 2012 all but killed the project, which was designed to help the state's bioscience industry survive. So far, the centre's numbers are dismal. According to a state report, while it's budgeted to absorb about $25 million in state funds, it's only managed to attract $12.8 million. Those funds will be used to help repay a line of credit used to finance the renovations, but not the construction costs. Story continues below advertisement "It's a bit of an inconvenience that the current state of budgeting is that we're somewhat hamstrung in terms of what we
