Bone marrow transplants and even bone marrow transplants under special circumstances, are restricted to the very young or the very old or people with some serious disease. Most people, even those without severe disease, require periodic transfusions of blood which are not readily available.

It is our interest to find out how cells differentiate into several different types and how this differentiation can be blocked. These "stem cells" might be useful in helping the body produce specific types of blood cells. It is also possible that these stem cells may be useful in promoting normal bone formation. By understanding this process we can find a new way to regenerate the bone of the appendicular skeleton. Our research will be carried out in several guinea pigs and mice whose development is easily followed in utero. At birth the neonatal guinea pig is a hairless creature with a body weight of about 500 grams. The neonatal mouse weighs about 3 grams. The neonatal guinea pig is just beginning to grow the bones of its appendicular skeleton. We have performed two studies in which we have transplanted cells from the fetal guinea pig mesonephros (kidney) into pre-natal and neonatal guinea pigs and have observed the formation of bone. We have also studied the effects of external bone forming factors on mesenchymal stem cells in our mouse model. The results of our studies demonstrate that stem cells are present in bone marrow and the mesonephros and that the physical state of the stem cells within the bone marrow, the mesonephros and other tissues affects the ability of cells to form bone. The proposed research will:

- 1) learn more about the characteristics of bone forming stem cells and their precursors from the mesonephros and bone marrow;
- 2) determine what determines the ability of the cells to produce bone; and
- 3) determine the basic characteristics of the precursors of osteoblasts and osteocytes.

The types of experiments we propose to conduct are designed to test the following specific hypotheses: 1) cells can b7e8fdf5c8
